SYNOPSIS: Magicians J. Daniel Atlas, Merritt McKinney, Henley Reeves, and Jack Wilder each receive tarot cards leading them to a New York City apartment. There, they discover hologram technology instructions from an unknown benefactor.

A year later, at Vegas, they perform as "The Four Horsemen" in a show funded by insurance magnate Arthur Tressler. Their final trick involves transporting an audience member inside a Crédit Républicain bank vault in Paris, and stacks of euros are drawn into the vault's air vents and showered on the crowd; the trick appears to have happened as the Paris vault is found empty of its recent shipment.

FBI agent Dylan Rhodes and French Interpol agent Alma Dray arrest the Horsemen but release them for lack of evidence. The Horsemen actually used a mock vault under the stage. Stealing the money beforehand, they replaced it with flash paper designed to resemble the money.

They also manipulated the participant, who was selected long before the heist to attend the show. He was later hypnotized into helping to perform the final trick. The Horsemen forged his signature on the card in the real vault using his credit card.

Aided by Thaddeus Bradley (a former magician turned magic debunker), the FBI follow the Horsemen to their next show in New Orleans, where they transfer millions from Tressler's private accounts to members of the audience whose insurance claims were denied by his company after Hurricane Katrina. Rhodes attempts to capture the magicians, but they escape.

Furious, Tressler hires Thaddeus to expose them for robbing him. Alma suspects that the Horsemen are part of a secret organization called "the Eye", a group of skilled magicians who steal from the powerful to those who are vulnerable.

Discovering that the Horsemen replaced Dylan's cell phone with a bugged clone to remain ahead of the investigation, the FBI tracks Dylan's real phone to the New York apartment, where three of the Horsemen escape while Jack stays behind to destroy evidence.

Jack loses control of his car in a chase and seemingly dies in a crash. Dylan recovers papers pointing to the Horsemen's next crime: stealing millions from the manufacturing company Elkhorn's safe. After answering a call from Thaddeus, Dylan suspects that Alma may be helping the Horsemen, which she denies.

The FBI head to Elkhorn's warehouse, but find the safe missing, having been loaded on a truck under orders of a hypnotised FBI agent, and intercepted. Opening the safe, they find it is a decoy full of balloon animals. The FBI converge on the Horsemen's final show at 5 Pointz, where they give a farewell message to the crowd. As they leap off the roof, Alma stops Dylan from shooting them before the Horsemen disappear in a shower of counterfeit money.

The real money from the Elkhorn safe is found in Thaddeus's car, so he is arrested, presumed to be the Horsemen's accomplice. Dylan visits him in jail, where Thaddeus realizes he is the true mastermind behind the Horsemen's plots. He helped them dupe the FBI into following the duplicate safe.

Jack, who faked his death with a decoy car and a cadaver stolen from a morgue, breaks into the real safe. They trick the FBI into believing the safe was missing, although it was hidden behind a giant mirror, and frame Thaddeus with the stolen money. At the Central Park Carousel, the Horsemen are welcomed by Dylan as the newest members of the Eye.

At the Pont des Arts in Paris, Dylan meets with Alma, who has also deduced his involvement with the Horsemen. He reveals he is the son of Lionel Shrike, a magician exposed by Thaddeus thirty years prior. Shrike attempted to relaunch his career but died inside a safe during a failed escape trick.

Dylan instrumented the Horsemen tricks as retribution for Shrike's death: Elkhorn's faulty safe led to the accident; Thaddeus destroyed Shrike's career and Crédit Républicain and Tressler's insurance company denied Shrike's life insurance. Alma, having feelings for Dylan, agrees to keep his secret.
